Katherine Morton

Katherine Morton is a Professor of Global Affairs at the Schwarzman College, Tsinghua University and an associate of the University of Oxford China Centre. She is also an associate fellow at Chatham House. Prior to her appointment at the Schwarzman College, Prof. Morton held the positions of Chair in China's International Relations at the University of Sheffield and Associate Dean for Research at the College of Asia and the Pacific, Australian National University. She is a leading authority on China and International Relations with a particular emphasis upon the domestic and international motivations behind China's changing role in the world and the implications for foreign policy and the study of global governance. Her research addresses China's role in responding to global climate change and environmental degradation and non-traditional security issues such as food security and transboundary water issues. Other research projects include work on East Asia security relations, China's Western frontier, maritime security in the East and South China seas, and China's new silk roads. A major representative of the English School of International Relations, Professor Morton has held visiting fellowships to Columbia University, S Rajaratnam School of International Studies, Peking University, China Foreign Affairs University, and senior associate memberships to St Antony's College, University of Oxford. She is a regular participant in Track II security dialogues and policy briefings on China and the World and the changing regional order in Asia. She holds a PhD in International Studies from the Australian National University.
